DENVER -- Alpine Waste & Recycling is expanding its north Denver recycling plant.

The $1.1 million project will increase the Altogether Plant's size and capacity by about two-thirds.

"As the community becomes increasingly educated to the benefits of recycling, we have seen a significant increase in the flow of materials into our Altogether Recycling plant," said John Griffith, president of Alpine Waste in a news release.

When the work is finished in April, the plant will cover 52,000 square feet, up from 31,000.

The plant will have two filtering and sorting lines able to process 15,000 tons per month, up from 10,000 tons. Alpine accepts materials such as glass, plastic, aluminum, paper and cardboard from independent waste haulers. The Altogether Plant opened in September 2007.
